Storm chasers are people who follow extreme weather, like tornados, across the USA and try to get close. This is very dangerous because the winds are usually very strong, there's lightning and tornados can lift houses and cars in seconds. They go after these dangerous weather conditions because they are scientists or because it's their hobby. 'It isn't a good idea to be near a tornado, but they are so beautiful,' says Eric a storm chaser from Montana, USA.	Many storm chasers travel thousands of kilometres every spring and summer in the Great Plains. 'I plan my holidays in May or June and I spend the day looking for storms or tornados,' explains Eric. 'My brother and I usually drive for 8–10 hours every day when we're chasing storms, so we're exhausted when we go back to the hotel.' This summer Eric and his brother are going to use a new car that is safer and faster. It isn't easy or cheap to	find a tornado. Storm chasers use expensive computers to check the weather online and make notes on maps to decide where to drive. They look at satellite pictures and try to find bright white clouds. These show where a storm is starting. A satnav is also an important tool. 'We drive on roads that aren't on the map so we need a satnav to find our way back to the hotel,' says Eric. 'We always have a tent and sleeping bags in the car. Last year we used them twice!'

1 Storm chasers are always scientists. _____

2 Eric knows that storm chasing is dangerous. _____

3 The best time to chase tornados is in the winter. _____

4 Eric usually sleeps at a campsite. _____

5 Most storm chasers need gadgets to find a tornado. _____
