Madagascar is the fourth largest island in the world. The country is poor and most people earn less than $2 a day. However, there is growing interest in tourism here.

Madagascar has many species of plants and animals that do not exist in other countries. Between 80 and 90 percent of its animals and plants have only ever been found in Madagascar.

People have lived in Madagascar for a very long time. Most researchers believe that the first people came to the island over 2000 years ago from Borneo in the South China Sea. Since then Arabs and East Africans, and later Indians, Chinese and Europeans have all lived in Madagascar. The population has risen to over 20 million people, causing many environmental problems.

Nearly 50 percent of Madagascar's forests have disappeared in the last fifty years. Scientists estimated that almost half of Madagascar's animal and plant species are dead or will die. Unfortunately, at least 17 species of lemur, Madagascar's most famous animal, have become extinct since people arrived. Many plants and animals we know little about will be dead before we have a chance to know more about them.
