An old Boeing 727 aeroplane might not be most people's idea of home, but to Bruce Campbell that is exactly what it has become. The retired electrical engineer from Oregon, USA, who has a passion for aircraft, has spent over $200,000 creating a rather special home for himself.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

2 ____
What he did was buy a retired Boeing 727, which he then took apart. Next, he had the pieces transported to a ten-acre plot of land he already owned on the outskirts of Portland and rebuilt the aeroplane in the woods.

3 ____
Creating this unique home has been a slow process and so far has taken over fifteen years but Bruce is careful to reuse as much as he can of the old aeroplane. He has turned the cockpit* into his reading room, made one of the bathrooms usable again, put in a temporary shower and added a clear floor so that you can see the original structure of the plane. His unusual home also contains a sleeping area and a workable kitchen.

4 ____
At present Bruce lives in his aeroplane for six months of the year and spends the other six in Japan. As well as finishing the Portland plane project, he also has another idea that he is considering for the future: to buy another retired aeroplane and create a second home in Japan.

5 ____
So why is Bruce so keen on converting*2 disused aeroplanes into homes? He says there are many reasons but that retired airliners are strong, well designed, secure and made out of materials that will last. They also make an interesting and unusual home and are fun to live in.

6 ____
Perhaps in the future, as more and more aeroplanes are retired around the world, other people will copy his ideas. At least in this way, the aeroplanes would not become waste and would instead be re-used in a way which has a positive impact on both the environment and the people who decide to make them home.
