The Globe Theatre is an attraction in London found on the of the River Thames. It was originally built in but destroyed by fire during a performance in . It was again rebuilt a year later but closed in because the Puritan leader Oliver Cromwell ordered all theatres to be closed. The Globe is specifically for housing the plays of William Shakespeare who is the and famous in the UK. He created the plays such as Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra. It was here that Shakespeare all of his plays for the first time and even Queen Elizabeth I and James I used to watch the plays too.

That said, the Globe was also known for allowing and people into it. And today, one can still stand in the pits for a five-pound which allows you to watch the show just like the people in the more expensive areas. The Globe bears its name because of its and unorthodox layout : it's in the of a circle or globe and so allows for more people to watch because more people can watch from all .

In , the Globe was remade and is now called Shakespeare's Globe on the original site. Every year the company still Shakespeare's plays.
