Long Bien Bridge, about 2 km from Hoan Kiem Lake, was built in 1903 by the architects of Daydé & Pillé, a French company. Before Vietnam's independence in 1954, it was called Doumer Bridge, named after Paul Doumer – a French president.

At that time, it was one of the longest bridges in Asia with the length of 2,500 m. For the French colonial government, the construction was of strategic importance in securing control of northern Vietnam. From 1899 to 1902, more than 3,000 Vietnamese took part in the construction.

The bridge was heavily bombarded during Vietnam War due to its critical position (the only bridge at that time across the Red River and connect Hanoi to the main port Haiphong). The first attack took place in 1967, and the center span of the bridge was felled.

The bridge now is known as a witness to the history of Hanoi. Some parts of the structure remain in the original state, while large sections have clearly been built later to repair the holes. A project with support and loan from the French government is currently in progress to restore the bridge to its original appearance.

From the bridge, tourists can enjoy the beauty of magnificent twilights when the sun gradually disappears behind the brightly shining Red River. Therefore, it is becoming one of the most ideal attractions in Hanoi.
