After a long day at work, Sarah decided to treat himself to a nice dinner. She knew it was important to take care of themselves, especially during stressful times. Her friend Jack also needed some time for ourselves because he had been working non-stop. Last weekend, Sarah and Jack went camping, and they even set up the tent by myself. They didn't need anyone's help and were proud to have done everything on their own. Jack, being very resourceful, managed to cook dinner over the campfire. The campfire, however, didn't start easily, so Sarah had to remind Jack to trust itself to get it done. After the trip, Sarah told Jack, "Next time, I'll challenge yourselves to go hiking on a tougher trail. I will try to break my own record!"

Part 5

You are going to read an extract from a novel. For questions 31–36, choose the answer (A, B, C or D) which you think fits best according to the text.

In the exam, mark your answers on the separate answer sheet.

'This came today, Jo. I forgot to tell you', Dad said, an opened brown envelope in his hand. He took out a letter, saying as he handed it to me, 'The big house at the back of ours has been bought by a property developer. The letter's from the City Council, asking if we object. They've applied for permission to pull down the house and put up an apartment block instead, plus eight three-storey houses on the garden.' This came as such a shock that I didn't say anything about it at all at first.

Dad had been right when he'd said that whoever bought the big house would probably really be buying the garden. What neither of us had realised, though, was that it wouldn't be the garden itself they'd be after. I couldn't imagine it with a big block of flats and houses standing on it, the earth covered over and suffocated; my greatest fear was that there would be nowhere for the butterflies and bees to come any more. Some might move into our little gardens, but there wouldn't be much room.

That night I had a dream about bulldozers and I woke up in the morning with a terrible jump. I supposed that everyone else in our street would have had the same letter as us. I wondered why they weren't all out there, talking over their garden walls – painting banners, tying themselves line 16 to trees – protesting. Come to think of it, why wasn't I? Before I had time to feel guilty about that, though, the scramble to get to school began and I stopped thinking about it for a while.

I often go into Dad's study after school. He always pretends he wants to be left till about six, but he's on his own all day and I think he must need a bit of company by four-ish, to see him through. That day he was trying to finish designing a book called Home Maintenance. He'd scanned a lot of pictures and diagrams into the computer and he was busy numbering them, muttering that the text was too long as always.

'Everyone will have had that letter we had, won't they?' I said, leaning against his work table to watch him. Dad said they would. I noticed he was wearing his chewed-up grey sweater, the one he puts on when he's expecting a job to be challenging. 'Well, will they do anything?'

'Like what?' He wasn't paying attention. He was sliding a diagram about on the screen, and trying to fit some text in beside it. It wasn't going to be easy.

'Well, will they do something to stop it happening?'

'Shouldn't think so,' he said. 'It's not going to be stopped by anything we say.'

I felt sure he was missing the point. Even though he was making a big thing about looking at me and not looking at his screen, I knew what his mind was really on. 'The developers have asked for permission,' I said, in the same annoyingly patient voice he'd been using. 'If you ask for permission that means someone could refuse. The Council must be able to.'

'They could,' said Dad, speaking even more 'patiently'. 'Our not wanting it isn't a good enough reason, Jo. We've got our own houses and gardens, nobody's taking those away.'

'We could try,' I said, but Dad shook his head.
