Scientists have been debating global warming for a long time. Despite their disagreements about the potential consequences for Earth, the majority of scientists maintain that global warming is indeed occurring and that we have the ability to halt it. To be certain, we need to collect more data over the course of a few more years. However, individuals must act to halt it right now.

A wide variety of gases make up our atmosphere. Some of them regulate our climate by absorbing solar heat. The gases that trap heat over the globe's surface are known as "greenhouse gases." Raising the concentration of these gases disrupts the equilibrium. These additional gases trap more heat.

According to some experts, the ecosystem is already changing as a result of global warming. This century, the Earth's temperature has increased by one degree Fahrenheit. Many scientists predict that the Earth's temperature will increase by two to eight degrees Fahrenheit in the next century. In ten thousand years, this would be the quickest ascent.

There might be an increase in sea levels. The water level might rise as the ice sheets melt. Numerous locations close to the shore would be vulnerable to floods. Certain plants and animals may suffer greatly if climate change occurs too quickly and in too large an amount. They could even go extinct. Extreme and violent weather is possible. There would be greater forest fires in some areas. However, there would be greater storms, floods, and rain in other places.

Question 29: What is the passage mainly about?

A. Proposed solutions to the issue of global warming.

B. The adverse consequences of global warming..

C. Global warming and forest fires.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

C. Forest fires would occur worldwide as a result of climate change.

D. The gasses we emit have the capacity to further enhance the retention of heat.

Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct option that best fits each of the numbered blanks from 34 to 40.

Environmental specialists have proposed various strategies in the past few decades to slow down the process of deforestation in developing countries. It is true that numerous of these proposals are valuable ideas, as they are practical endeavors to address some of the causes of deforestation, including commercial forestry, cattle husbandry, and farming. All of them are contingent on some degree of government involvement.

We classify solutions into three main categories: internal agreements, state economic policies, and international programs. Generally, economic policies aim to restrict minor producers' activities through government intervention. It would be more difficult to squat or unlawfully establish oneself on land if government actions were to include the plain definition and enforcement of property rights. Conservation can be promoted through subsidies. In other words, producers who aim to reduce the typical level of forest damage from their operations could potentially receive compensation to increase their income. Taxes can also serve as a deterrent to undesirable land use.

Governments and indigenous or native peoples may reach an internal agreement in the moist rainforests and open woodlands of the tropics, where the majority of this deforestation is occurring. Under this type of agreement, individuals could participate in modified conventional activities that offer some economic rewards.

And finally, international agreements typically involve the exchange of monetary aid in exchange for government action to safeguard its forests. One such plan, in exchange for restrictions on specific types of activities in rainforests, aims to assist in the repayment of a nation's debt. The government receives money for prohibiting or restricting harvesting in its forests, rather than selling logging concessions to reduce that obligation. Proposals also propose a global fund to provide financial assistance to countries that choose to protect their environments.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

Clearly, action is required to safeguard the forests around the globe. If the current rate of deforestation persists, the world's rainforests will evaporate within 100 years, resulting in the extinction of the majority of plant and animal species on the planet and a multitude of adverse effects on the global climate.

Question 34: What is the passage mainly about?

A. Suggestions for indigenous peoples and governments to address current environmental issues.

B. There are numerous strategies for mitigating the detrimental environmental consequences of deforestation.

C. Environmental experts have expressed apprehension regarding the consequences of deforestation.

D. Governments should offer economic incentives to encourage responsible land use.
