The Hmong are one of the largest ethnic minority groups in Vietnam, with a population of over one million people. They primarily live in the mountainous regions of northern Vietnam, including provinces like Ha Giang, Lao Cai, and Lai Chau. The Hmong have preserved their unique cultural identity for centuries, despite facing many challenges throughout history.

One of the most recognizable aspects of Hmong culture is their traditional clothing. Hmong women are known for their intricate embroidery and batik techniques, which they use to create colorful clothing decorated with geometric patterns. These skills are passed down from mothers to daughters over generations. Each design tells a story about their family history, beliefs, and connection to nature. Making one traditional outfit can take several months of careful work.

The Hmong people have a strong agricultural tradition. They grow rice, corn, and various vegetables on terraced fields carved into steep mountain slopes. Many families also raise livestock such as pigs, chickens, and buffaloes. However, modern life is changing their traditional way of living. Young Hmong people increasingly move to cities for education and employment, which can diminish the use of their native language and traditional customs in daily life.

Today, the Vietnamese government and various organizations work to support Hmong communities by improving education, healthcare, and infrastructure in mountainous areas. Tourism has also become important, as visitors come to experience Hmong culture, buy their handicrafts, and learn about their traditional lifestyle.

Today, many local communities are mixing online life with real neighborhood connections, and this creates new trends worth discussing. More people join Zalo/Facebook groups to (37) _____. This can save time and help strangers become "nearby friends." At the same time, it can also cause stress: one unclear post may spread fear, and some people feel judged if they do not follow the group's rules. So the big question is how to (38) _____.

Another hot mix of topics is "green living" and local business culture. Weekend clean-ups, second-hand swap markets, and refill stations for water or soap are becoming popular, especially with young people. Local cafés also join by (39) _____. These actions look small, but they can change habits. However, there is a debate: are these activities real change, or just a trendy image? Some residents say costs and convenience still matter most.

Finally, social media can turn a quiet street into a viral "must-visit" place. This brings tourists, new jobs, and better services, but it can also raise rent and make daily life louder. A community may need clear agreements—like quiet hours, (40) _____.

A. giving small discounts to customers who bring their own cups
B. keep these groups helpful, polite, and fair for everyone
C. share local news, recommend services, or warn others about scams
D. cleaner public spaces, and support for long-term residents—so growth feels shared, not unfair

Question 37: _____. Question 38: _____. Question 39: _____. Question 40: _____.
