Read the passage and answer the following questions.

Choosing a Future Profession: More Than Just a Job

I Choosing a future profession is not an easy task. It requires careful thought, strong will, and the ability to make up your mind without being too anxious about the future. Many students feel confused and overwhelmed. They worry they might choose the wrong path and suffer from regret later on. This is completely natural. However, those who are patient, logical, and sensible are more likely to make a wise decision. It is important to take a risk occasionally, especially if you feel passionate about a certain field.

II When deciding what profession to pursue, it is essential to understand your personality and qualities. Are you ambitious, aggressive, or competitive? These traits may be perfect for someone who wants to work in business or politics. On the other hand, if you are generous, understanding, and sensitive, you might be a better fit for a career in healthcare, education, or social work. Some people are dishonest or selfish and do not work well with others — qualities that can harm any work environment. Being reliable, responsible, and skilled are key qualities in nearly every profession.

III One issue to consider is whether to work in a rural or urban area. Each has its own advantages and challenges. In urban areas, there are more job opportunities, but the lifestyle is fast and can be stressful. Rural areas are more relaxed but may offer fewer career options. It's also important to consider whether your job will require you to participate in team projects, attend meetings, or even take part in demonstrations or protests — especially if you plan to be involved in politics, law, or activism. For example, an ambassador must represent their country with confidence and communicate well with others, even during difficult times.

IV Finally, think about your future life and how your career will affect your personality and lifestyle. Will you have time for family and hobbies? Will you be occupied all the time, or will you have a healthy work-life balance? No profession is perfect, but if you stay true to your values, keep a positive attitude, and remain open-minded, you are more likely to succeed. After all, choosing a career is not only about income — it's also about who you want to be.
