ESB B1 Entry Level 3 Reading (Part One)

You are going to read a text about the English language.
For questions 21 – 24, match the headings below (A – G) with the paragraphs.
There are TWO headings that you do not need. The first heading has been done as an example.

The English Language

Example: G. English Spoken Across the World

Today, English is the most popular language in the world, with an estimated 350 – 400 million native speakers. However, importantly, it is also the common language for many non-native speakers all over the world. Almost a quarter of the globe's population, possibly 1.5 – 2 billion people, can understand English and have, at least, a basic level, whether written or spoken. In fact, for every native speaker, there may be three non-native speakers.

21.

English is recognised as an international language and a large number of countries teach it in schools as their foreign language of choice. In fact, English is the most widely taught foreign language in schools across the globe, with over 100 countries teaching it to at least a working level. Over 1 billion people throughout the world are currently learning English, and there are estimated to be more students of English in China alone than there are inhabitants of the entire USA. A 2014 report by the British Council suggests that the number of people learning English is likely to continue to increase over the next 10 – 15 years, to reach around 2 billion, after which there may be a decline.

22.

English is the official language of industry and business. Over 90% of international airlines use English as their language of choice, known as "Airspeak". For instance, an Italian pilot flying an Italian plane into an Italian airport contacts ground control in English, not Italian. Similarly, a large number of global companies do business in English, even if all members of that company and others they deal with are non-English speakers.

23.

Up to 95% of popular music worldwide is in English, and American television and movies are available almost everywhere. Half of world newspapers are in English, and some 75% of world mail correspondence is in English. At least 35% of internet users are English speakers, and an estimated 70 – 80% of the content on the internet is in English.

24.

After centuries of use, and many changes, English has a rich vocabulary. No other language has so many words to say the same thing. We do not know how many words there are in the English language, but we think there are more than a million. In reality, it is almost impossible to count the number of words in any language. The Oxford English Dictionary contains about 615,000 word entries. This includes some scientific terms and dialect words. It does not include more specialised scientific and technical terms. There is a large number of new words and expressions invented each year. English is an ever-changing language adapting to an ever-changing world.

ESB B1 Entry Level 3 Reading (Part Two)

You are going to read a text about growing up with two languages.
For questions 31 – 35, choose the correct answer A, B, C or D.

Growing up with Two Languages

The other day the sales assistant in the shop asked me, "How did you learn such good English?" Her question surprised me as I was born in London to foreign parents, an Austrian father and an Italian mother. I was educated in the UK and, despite my foreign-sounding name, people thought I was British when I was growing up.

I wasn't even particularly skilled in Italian when I was a child. Every summer, my aunt, who lived in Rome, used to take my sisters and me for a month's holiday to the Italian coast. There, my Italian slowly improved, though I made lots of mistakes.

I remember the moment when I realised that speaking two languages could give me two identities. At the age of 13, I spent the summer with a family friend and her children in a house in Italy, where I spoke only in Italian for six weeks, living like an Italian teenager. On the first day back in England, I could not remember how to speak English. I had changed into a different person in those six weeks away. I had become an Italian girl.

As an adult, I live like an Italian in London. I write in English, but speak Italian on a daily basis with my Italian husband. I also speak it at work. As a result, my Italian is stronger than my English and strangers think that I am not British.

Unfortunately, my husband and I have not spoken much Italian with our three children so they are not very good at it. But, if they were asked, all three would say they were 'Italian Londoners'.

Growing up within two cultures can have positive and negative aspects for both the children and the parents. As an adult, my friend, Mary, taught herself the language of her Ethiopian parents. She realised that it was a way to find out about her family history. However, it was not always easy for her as a teenager. She wanted to forget her Ethiopian culture, so she could be accepted by her British classmates. She even changed her tastes in music and food. Now, Mary appreciates the interesting culture that she has been given by her parents. However, it is not easy for parents living abroad to give their children a cultural identity and allow them the freedom to find their own.
