Hurricane

The weather is very unpredictable and should be treated seriously. In places such as the Pacific and Atlantic Ocean, hurricanes can form when the conditions are met. These natural occurrences are also commonly known as typhoons. A hurricane can be very deadly as well as dangerous.

A hurricane is a phenomenon where a storm forms over very warm water in the ocean. The warm water heats up the air and the air rises rapidly into the atmosphere. The combination of rapidly-rising hot air and strong winds forms a hurricane. A hurricane is essentially a huge storm with strong winds spiralling inwards and upwards. In other words, it 'pulls' the air around it into its centre. It carries heavy rain together with strong winds. The wind speeds can vary from 100 to 350 kilometres per hour.

In an event of a hurricane, people are recommended to stay indoors and keep all doors locked at all times. It is also advised to keep away from low-lying and flood-prone areas. Additional supplies are also required to be kept for emergencies.
