The American family isn't exactly what it used to be decades ago. Households with three generations within the same family lounges – grandparents, parents and children – living under one roof _____ a small slice of American life. Today, one in six American lives in multigenerational households (MGHs). As with everything, such a structure has its advantages and disadvantages, however, many experts say that advantages outweigh disadvantages. On the plus side, it allows families to cope better with the challenges they face, such as raising and _____ a child, _____ the elderly, single parenthood, low income, or high cost of living and housing. But family closeness not also creates strains due to a lack of privacy, lack of space or noise. Families must establish new rules for chores and adapt to one another's tastes in food, clothes, way of life, etc.

Although multigenerational households are growing faster than any other type of housing arrangement, the basic family unit nowadays is still a nuclear family. The reason for this is, perhaps, the fact _____ only parents and children. Parents' preference to live in such families is dictated by their need to live independently. They are more mobile, they have more personal space and they devote more time and resources to each person. However, living in a nuclear family reduces contact with relatives such as grandparents, aunts and uncles. What's more, if two parents work, there is no time to _____ the children's needs. It is important to recognise that apart from multigenerational and nuclear households there are other family structures such as single-parent families or so called „stop-generation" families, where grandparents live with their grandchildren without the parents, because they either died, _____ or _____ to prison.
