Dynamite fishing is the practice of using explosives to kill a large number of fish and to make it easier to collect. Although this practice is made illegal in many countries, many fishermen still resort to this method to catch fish. They say making a bomb is cheaper and more effective than using traditional fishing methods with hooks and traps. Dynamite is also easier to access nowadays. However, the explosives do not only kill their targets but they also affect the surrounding eco-system as they destroy the natural habitats of many forms of marine life. They also destroy the coral reef which support fines, crabs and other species as well as plays an important role in controlling carbon dioxide levels in the ocean. In some countries, thanks to the introduction of heavy fines, the governments manage to stamp out this practice. However, there are still places where dynamite fishing still occurs on a large scale, which raises a lot of concerns.
