Modern crime

Modern technology brings with it modern crimes. One of the most common crimes today – and certainly one of the most worrying – is identity fraud. This is when someone steals your personal information and uses it to take money from your bank accounts.

People can do this in many ways. One way is by using the Internet. Today so many people give all sorts of information on the net when they buy and sell things or check their bank accounts. It is quite easy for clever thieves to find this out. Something else thieves do is to steal rubbish bags from outside our houses or rubbish tips. They check through them to find personal letters, letters from our banks and from other organisations. From these they can learn our account numbers and other personal information such as the names of our family members and pets and also information about our spending habits.

To protect people from this kind of theft, there are special security systems on our personal computers and on the Internet. We must also be very careful about what we throw away. Unfortunately, when we stop this type of crime, another will probably replace it. Criminals are always looking for new ways to make money!
