Ask people about their favourite toys and quite a few will mention Lego. However, some children don't abandon Lego when they . Take James May, whose idea to build a life-size Lego received so much public interest that, in July 2009, he construction.

Over 1,000 helped make the bricks, each one consisting of 272 Lego pieces, and put the two-storey house together. Apart from a 'safety frame' made out of , the rest of the structure was made entirely from Lego, a staircase, a shower and a toilet! May even stayed overnight in the house, though he found far from comfortable on the Lego bed!

Initially, the Lego house was a huge but problems arose when the landowners where the house was needed their land back. At first, Legoland, a theme park in Berkshire, planned to relocate the house to its , but the deal fell through because of the transport involved.

Despite further efforts to find a private collector to take it, the house was eventually and its 3.3 million pieces were donated to . Nevertheless, the Lego house was a architectural achievement for those involved in its construction.

Ask people about their favourite toys and quite a few will Lego. However, some children don't abandon Lego when they . Take James May, whose idea to build a life-size Lego received so much public interest that, in July 2009, he construction.

Over 1,000 helped make the , each one consisting of 272 Lego pieces, and put the two-storey house together. Apart from a 'safety frame' made out of , the rest of the was made entirely from Lego, a staircase, a and a toilet! May even stayed in the house, though he found far from comfortable on the Lego bed!

Initially, the Lego house was a huge but problems arose when the where the house was needed their land back. At first, Legoland, a theme park in Berkshire, planned to the house to its , but the deal because of the transport involved.

Despite further efforts to find a private collector to take it, the house was eventually and its 3.3 million were donated to . Nevertheless, the Lego house was a architectural achievement for those in its construction.

Ask people about their favourite toys and quite a few will Lego. However, some children don't Lego when they . Take James May, whose idea to build a life-size Lego received so much public that, in July 2009, he construction.

Over 1,000 helped make the , each one consisting of 272 Lego pieces, and put the two-storey house together. Apart from a 'safety frame' made out of , the rest of the was made from Lego, a staircase, a and a toilet! May even stayed in the house, though he found far from on the Lego bed!

Initially, the Lego house was a huge but problems arose when the where the house was needed their land back. At first, Legoland, a in Berkshire, planned to the house to its , but the deal because of the transport involved.

Despite further to find a private collector to take it, the house was eventually and its 3.3 million were donated to . Nevertheless, the Lego house was a achievement for those in its construction.