We all have things we can't live without. We know what's important to us. What's important to other people?

A museum in Britain took a survey to find what things were important to people. Technology figured prominently on the list of things people couldn't live without. An Internet connection was number 2 on a list of fifty items, and a cell phone/smartphone at 10. Web applications were numerous: Facebook at number 5, Google at 22, Ebay at 35, and Twitter was at the bottom of the list at number 50. Of course, food was also important. Tea and coffee were at number 11. Fresh vegetables were at number 16 and fresh fruit at number 21. I bet you can guess the other food on the list: chocolate, of course (at number 27). Placing surprisingly high on the list were hair straighteners at number 24. But proving that the simple things in life are the most important is the fact that number 1 on the list was sunshine.

An online study found that 28 percent of those polled named the Internet as the one technology they can't live without; email came in second at 18 percent. Facebook was lower on the overall list at only 3 percent, but among the younger crowd (ages 18-24), 15 percent said they can't live without Facebook.

In a survey of millennials (people born between 1980 and 2000), a large number would choose to give up driving rather than their smartphone or laptop. The survey was ordered by a car rental company so that it could show that owning cars was not as important to millennials, but the study again points up the central importance of technology in people's lives.
