Social media can be a powerful tool for connecting with people around the world, staying informed, and sharing our experiences. However, it's important to use it consciously and in balance to avoid its potential negative effects on our mental health. By limiting the time we spend on it, following accounts that add value, and avoiding comparisons with others, we can enjoy the benefits of social media without it affecting our self-esteem or productivity. Promoting healthy social media use also means remembering that real life is more important than virtual life and that face-to-face relationships are essential for our well-being.
