Paul started the first School of Rock in 1998 in Philadelphia, USA. At first, he gave students rock music lessons after school, but he wanted to do more. He began offering them opportunities to perform in real rock concerts. "Some of our students have never played in front of an audience before," he says. Paul and his team teach them how to perform confidently on stage. Over the years, he has trained hundreds of young people to become rock performers. Many students enjoy listening to music while studying and believe it helps them learn. However, many parents and teachers argue that music is distracting, and students work better in silence. To find out who is right, scientists carried out a study. They asked three groups of students to either listen to Mozart's music, listen to a relaxation tape, or sit in silence for ten minutes. After that, the students took a "spatial reasoning" test, which measured their ability to remember shapes and imagine objects from different angles. The results showed that students who listened to Mozart performed better. Scientists also found that participating in musical activities and learning to play an instrument can improve verbal memory. The longer the training, the greater the improvement. So, there's really no reason to quit those piano lessons!
