Most people know that sleep is important, but few realise just how much the body depends on it. While you sleep, your brain still works hard to process information and strengthen memories from the day. Research shows that during deep sleep, the brain removes toxic proteins that could lead to serious illness. Sleep also plays a vital role in physical health. The immune system becomes stronger after a good night's rest. In contrast, people who regularly sleep fewer than six hours per night are more likely to suffer from stress and other diseases.

For teenagers, the situation is especially critical because they need between eight and ten hours of sleep per night for healthy brain development. However, many teens get less than this because of school schedules and social networking at night. Experts warn that lacks of sleep not only affect concentration but
