My School Trip

A school day trip to London sounded totally cool! We'd even get the chance to go up The Monument and see the amazing view of the city from the top. My mates and I couldn't wait to go! But I never dreamed that our fun day out would turn into a disaster.

I've never liked heights much and found it difficult to peer over the edge of tall buildings. But I was fine in aeroplanes, so I figured it was something I'd get over. I had no idea that I'd got a real phobia about them – until our school day trip.

Our day started early. We got on the train with our lunchboxes and spending money. First stop was the Royal Bank of England Museum. For security reasons we couldn't see the vaults, but we watched a film about them and saw loads of interesting stuff like printing notes. Then we had a picnic in the park before heading to see The Monument.

There were 311 spiral steps to the top. All I thought was, 'Wow, I'm going to be really tired!' The thought I might be scared didn't even occur to me. My friends and I were one of the last groups to start climbing. The steps spiralled round and round, which made us all feel dizzy, but I was still okay. I stayed to the left of the staircase, next to a wall with the occasional grubby window, so I had no idea how high we'd climbed. Then my friend Rachel looked down the stairwell, over the railing on our right and said, 'Oh no! Whatever you do, don't look down.' So what did I do? You guessed it.....
