Many people code-switch between languages or dialects. What are the reasons for code-switching?

People may use another language so that others around them cannot understand what they are saying.

Some phrases or topics may feel easier or more natural to express in one language than in another.

People often code-switch between languages or dialects for several reasons.

Speakers may change the way they talk to feel part of a group or to be accepted by others.

Lastly, code-switching can happen because of suitability or comfort.

In short, people switch languages to connect with others, keep information private, or express themselves more naturally.

Another reason is to convey secrecy.

One reason is social acceptance.
