Today's teenagers are increasingly aware of the importance of environmental and social responsibility. They don't just observe what is happening around them, but actively participate in efforts aimed at improving the environment and society.

Many teenagers are involved in global environmental movements. Besides, they organise local campaigns to clean up litter, plant trees, and promote waste separation. Teenagers also realise the significance of reducing the use of plastic and changing to environmentally friendly products. They become an example for adults, showing how small changes in everyday life can have a big impact on the planet.

In addition to environmental issues, teenagers are engaged in social efforts. They take part in volunteer programmes and support charitable organisations. For example, many teenagers join projects aimed at helping the homeless or supporting children with disabilities. They realise that everyone can contribute to a better society.

Teenagers today are the generation that shapes the future. Their environmental and social responsibility activities are an important step towards creating a sustainable and fair world.
