A Little Toothpaste Is Enough

Every morning, Kevin brushes his teeth before going to school. He usually puts toothpaste along almost the whole toothbrush. He thinks this is the right way because he often sees advertisements showing a long line of toothpaste on a toothbrush.

One morning, Kevin's mother gave him only a small amount of toothpaste, about the size of his fingernail. Kevin was surprised because he thought it would not be enough. However, after brushing his teeth, his mouth still felt clean and fresh.

Kevin then remembered that when he used a lot of toothpaste, some of it often fell into the sink or onto the floor. His mother explained that using more toothpaste did not necessarily make his teeth cleaner. A small amount was already enough.

Kevin also started thinking about the advertisements he had seen. He realized that advertisements were made to make people interested in buying products. If people used a lot of toothpaste every day, the toothpaste would run out faster, so they would have to buy a new toothpaste sooner.

From that day on, Kevin decided to use only a small amount of toothpaste. He also tried not to waste it.

27. Circle the correct option!

Why did Kevin probably use a lot of toothpaste before?

A. He wanted to finish his toothpaste quickly.

B. He believed that more toothpaste would clean his teeth better.

C. His mother told him to use the whole toothbrush.

D. He did not like the taste of his toothpaste.

Why Do We Need So Many Rupiahs?

Rafi was learning about money in his English class. One day, his teacher showed the class some prices from Indonesia and the United States.

Rafi was surprised. In Indonesia, people often talk about prices using thousands, millions, billions, and even trillions of rupiahs. In the United States, people can buy many things with only thousands or tens of thousands of dollars. For some people, even a few hundred dollars can already pay for many daily needs.

Rafi looked at a one-hundred-thousand-rupiah note in his hand. "This looks like a lot of money," he said. "But sometimes it does not last very long. We can spend it on food, transportation, or other daily needs in only a short time."

His teacher explained that the difference was not simply because one country had "more money." The value of the currencies was different. Indonesia is also a country with many natural resources, such as oil, gas, coal, forests, and minerals. Rafi wondered why a country with so many resources still had problems with the value of its money.

"I think the government should work seriously to manage the country's resources and economy," Rafi said. "If leaders do not make good decisions, ordinary people may feel the effects when prices rise and their money buys less."

Rafi realized that having many natural resources was not enough. A country also needed good management, careful economic policies, and responsible leaders.

31. Circle the correct answer!

What can we know from Rafi's observation about the Indonesian rupiah?

A. Indonesian people never use small amounts of money.

B. The rupiah has a different value compared with the US dollar.

C. People in the United States do not need much money.

D. Everything in Indonesia is more expensive than everything in the United States.

32. True or False

Read the statement and write True or False. Then explain your answer in one sentence.

Rafi thinks that having many natural resources automatically makes a country's economy strong.

Answer: _____
