BEAUTY IS IN THE EYE OF THE BEHOLDER

What's your idea of an attractive person? Someone with long, flowing hair? Or someone with a perfectly smooth, hairless head? Do you find pierced ears attractive? What about pierced noses? If you ask ten people these questions, you get ten different answers.

The idea of beauty varies a lot from person to person and even more so, from society. The male Kayapo Indians from the Amazon have their lower lips stretched. They have a round plate fitted inside. This may seem horrible to you, but to the Kayapo is a sign of beauty. In some parts of Myanmar, where long necks are desirable, women have necklets-decorated metal rings- fixed round their necks to make them longer.

Some fashion develop from religious beliefs. Rastafarians have their long hair twisted into thick strands. These are called dreadlocks. The lion is an important symbol in their religion and the dreadlocks symbolized a lion's mane. Many other people, black and white, have adopted his hairstyle simply because they find it attractive.

The search for beauty is not a modern phenomenon. In ancient Egypt people had their nails, palms and soles of their feet stained with henna, a red vegetable dye. They also highlighted the veins on their temples with blue paint. Women had their skin lightened with ochre, a reddish-yellow coloring; men had theirs darkened with orange paint. Both men and women used to line their eyes with a black powder called Kohl.

We may disagree on what is beautiful but that makes the world a more interesting place. Imagine how boring it would be if we all looked the same or had the same opinions! Variety, after all, is the spice of life.
