Emma Jones was believed to have asked neighbours to turn down their music before she was fatally stabbed. Miss Jones, whose five-year-old son Llyr has learning difficulties, was injured in an argument with neighbours after she confronted them at 2am on Saturday.

Miss Jones's son was believed to be staying with his grandparents.

Neighbours in the village of Penygroes in North Wales, said she had crossed the road from her house to a block of flats to ask those at a party to turn down the music.

One said: "There was an almighty row. When the ambulance got to the flat there was nothing paramedics could do."

Miss Jones had told those at the party they were "keeping half the neighbourhood awake."

Another villager said: "To be stabbed to death for simply asking someone to turn down the music at a house party is shocking and awful.

"You would think that any decent person would have apologised and abided by the request especially at two in the morning.

"She did such a good job with her son as he suffers from severe learning difficulties – she was totally dedicated to him.

"Everyone is in total shock over this tragic death."

Paramedics were unable to save her and she died from massive blood loss.

Jean Owen, who lives nearby, said: "It's a terrible thing to happen in a village like this."

She added: "She was a lovely young lady."

A 23-year-old woman from Llanllyfni was charged with murder last night and was due to appear at Carnarvon magistrates' court today.

A North Wales Police statement said: "Police can now confirm that Emma died as a result of a stab wound she received."
