Unit 3_Advanced reading 2

Participating in school clubs remains a common after-school activity. According to a study, the three most popular types are sports clubs, performing arts clubs, and academic clubs. While overall participation in these clubs dropped over the last two decades, this does not mean that students are less active. Teens today like to volunteer or work with community groups more.

While the kinds of activities that students participate in school didn't change greatly, high school teens now spend their leisure time out of school in very different ways. For example, teens today are less likely to visit a friend in person than 20 years ago.

One of the reasons for these changes is technology. Teens today have greater access to the Internet, and it becomes their main channel for socializing and getting information.

Calling and texting are the most popular modes of communication among teens. Teens also connect with friends online through social media. 92% of American teens go online every day. 71% use more than one social networking site, with Facebook and Instagram being very popular.
