 Read the following passage and choose the best answer for each of the following questions (1,25 points)

Scientists, doctors, psychologists and parents have long compared children and their birth order, trying to sort out the differences that arise due to birth order. One such difference is the high level of independence seen in only children.

Adult Attention

For only children, their parents remained focused solely on them throughout childhood and do not become preoccupied with new arrivals in the family. One might think that this singular focus of the parents could result in clinginess and insecurity in later years. However, this is not at all true. Instead, the only child will most often find this attention reassuring, giving them a very stable foundation from which to reach out, explore and grow within their world.

Childhood Experiences

Another difference is simply the amount of time spent with adults. Only children thrive in an environment in which they are often surrounded by more adult conversation and activity, giving them a very real glimpse into the world of adults. Instead of seeing their family as pivoting around themselves or "the children" the only child will be introduced to bigger ideas, concepts and topics of conversation early on in their childhood. This encourages a child to grow in maturity, a major component of an independent personality.

Only children are generally highly independent due to these various factors. However, it is important to remember that, regardless of your child's natural personality tendencies or birth order placement, they are a very real and very unique individual.
