Fetishes and Zuni People

Fetishes are small objects that depict animals or icons that are important in several North American indigenous cultures. They are carved in stone, precious gems, coral, shells and other materials. North American Indians believe that fetishes have magical powers and give people protection at different moments in life. Nowadays, these hand-carved figures are considered to be pieces of artwork. Among the different fetishes made by various indigenous peoples, the ones created by the Zuni people are the most admired.

The Zuni tribe lives in New Mexico, in the United States, where they keep a set of traditional customs – and carving fetishes is one of them. They make fetishes of animals whose characteristics are important to them.

Mountain lion – Seen as having leadership skills and as being resourceful and powerful.

Bear – Associated with strength, introspection and self-knowledge. Also seen as the great protector and healer.

Coyote – Respected for its survival skills and related to humor and the ability to laugh at oneself.

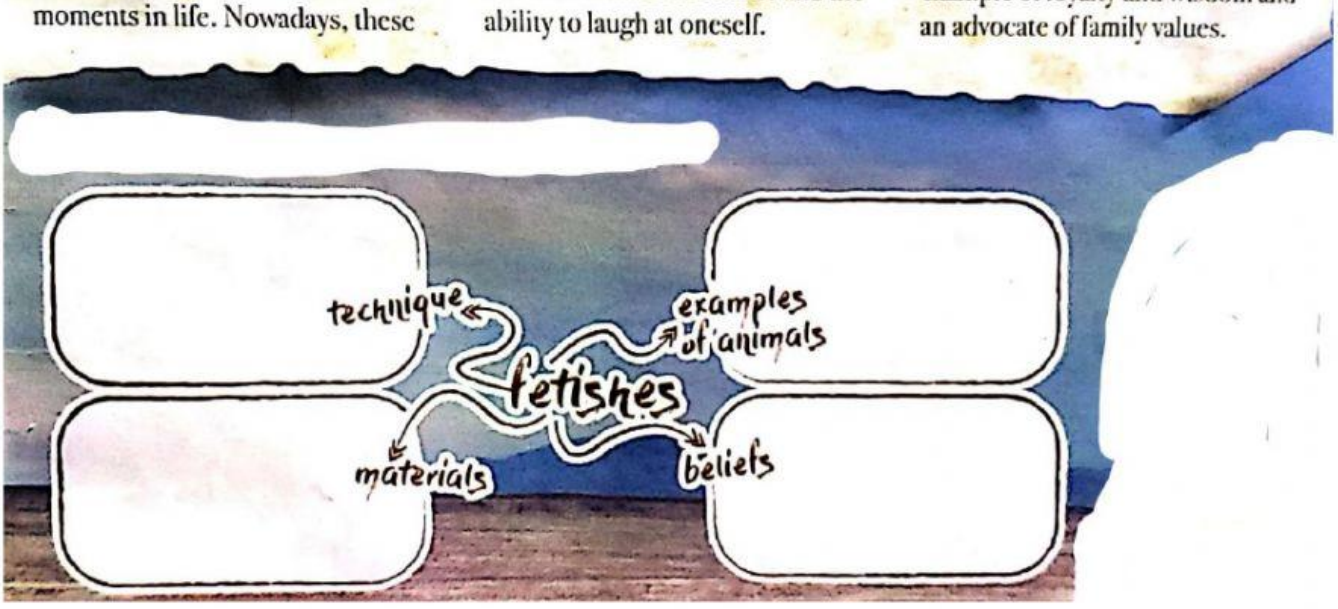

Badger – Although seen as aggressive, perseverance is the main characteristic of this animal according to the Zuni people.

Eagle – Known for its creativity, intuition and great vision. Also seen as a healer.

Mole – Considered protector of crops and the underground. The Zuni people see it as a symbol of introspection and awareness.
