Asian elephants are the largest land mammals in Asia. They can grow up to around 3 meters tall and weigh over 5 tons. They have been very important in the culture and religion of many Asian countries throughout history. But now, they are endangered because of habitat destruction and hunting. Asian elephants are smaller than African elephants, but they look quite similar. The females are more social than the males, and they often form groups called "herds." Male Asian elephants usually live alone. The female elephants give birth to babies every few years, and the baby elephants can weigh up to 150kg! They enjoy eating grass and the leaves, roots, and stems of different plants. They sometimes eat crops like bananas, too. As they need to drink water everyday, Asian elephants never go far from fresh water.
