

An illustration of a fox and a round character (Kolobok) in a forest setting. The fox is on the left, looking towards the right. The round character is on the right, looking up at the fox. The background is dark with some foliage.

Kolobok was independent _____ his creators. He hoped _____ freedom and once resorted _____ escape. He was prejudiced _____ this world and had a belief _____ a better place for him. This desperate guy set up a bakery for his old owners putting all his money into it, and while they were making a go of their business, he went about the journey and hit the road. He forgot, though, that perils were around, too, and was surprised _____ meeting Mrs. Fox on the edge of the forest. She experienced some difficulties _____ searching _____ rabbits these days, so she recognised him _____ a lunch. Under no circumstances could she miss the prey and also, she didn't want to share it out. "I will eat you", she said. But Kolobok objected _____ it. He was persisting _____ letting him go. He warned Mrs. Fox _____ eating him and commented _____ her utterance appealing _____ the Declaration on fictional characters' rights. However, he didn't have a say since Mrs. Fox was accustomed _____ this kind of retorts, therefore she was confident _____ her decision. The round chatterbox must have been shocked _____ her huge open mouth!
