There is nothing new about conflicts between parents and teenagers. Conflicts can arise from different sources, some as simple as parents' disapproval of their teenage child's fashion choices. The most common arguments are about untidiness and household chores. Parents can become enraged at untidy rooms, mountains of clothes on the floor, dirty clothes stuffed in the wardrobe and above all, their children's refusal to share the housework. Teenagers, on the other hand, become impatient when their parents keep nagging them for not cleaning up their room or refusing to do the shopping at the supermarket. The key to resolving this kind of conflict is communication. Parents can tell their children off when they leave the rooms untidy but they should also be aware that children's rooms are their private space.
