Company performance in a socially responsible world

Every investor loves companies that achieve their sales targets, manage their costs and perform well on the stock market and, therefore, make money.

However, a company nowadays also needs to think about its reputation with the public and its own staff. In other words, it has to be socially responsible. For example, it is expected to improve its environmental performance. In addition, it is often judged these days on workplace diversity: the number of women, people from ethnic minorities and disabled people in all positions, including senior management. This has become an important factor in recruitment. Finally, a company needs to have a good safety record, both in terms of its workers and the products which it produces.

In a recent survey, more than half (55%) of people worldwide said they are ready to pay more for products and services from companies that have positive social and environmental policies. This percentage is even higher in Asia-Pacific (64%), Latin America (63%) and the Middle East/Africa (63%). Without doubt, profits are no longer the only way to measure a company's success. Employees and customers expect a lot more.
