Morris: a retrospective

Black History Month saw the launch of a social history project to chronicle the life of Bristol activist Olive Morris.

One of London's Council's main buildings is named after her, but when artist Ann Laura Lopez de la Torre visited her for the first time in 1970, she found it empty. She decided to try to find out more and created Black History Month to launch an appeal for information from the community.

She was soon put in touch with L.C. One of Olive's friends and a fellow activist during the 1970s, he told her about the project and she decided to look at her life and surroundings. They have been joined by supporters of Olive's family and other people who knew her.

"We want to create some public memories and celebrate the woman's position in history. In the group there are women who have been active in the community for a long time and members of her family. What we are interested in is how we keep alive her history and memory for the future."

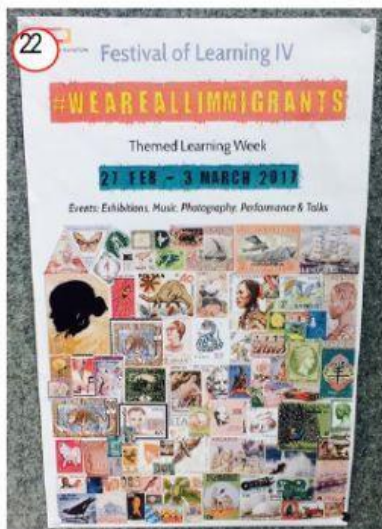

The group came together through a shared interest in Olive's past and her role in the community. They decided to spread the word. Olive was an activist who was heavily involved with emerging social and political movements in the 1970s. She set up the Bristol Black Women's Group, was a founder member of The Organisation of Women of African and Asian Descent (OWAAD) and part of the equaliser movement. However she died in 1979 aged just 37 and her life and the rest of the collective are remembered for her life to the present day.

She said: "She was a very interesting character and involved in a lot of different things - the Black Panthers, the equaliser movement and political activism."

"There is a lot of information about her life and her role in the Black community. She was a very interesting character and involved in a lot of different things - the Black Panthers, the equaliser movement and political activism."

Any job that is not of the man who were involved in the movement are now not known, but for women are not. So looking at Olive's life and the impact she had on so many things are very important to us."

The next meeting of the BOD will take place on 5 September at the Campaign for the Project, 166a Stowell Road, Bristol from 6.30pm and is open to all women.
