Friendship
by Bob Finkel

The butterfly cried. A rainstorm had washed her friend, the ant, into the river. The butterfly flew high and low trying to locate her lost friend. She flew faster than the times she had taken the ant upon her wings high over the meadows and through the forests. For days, she searched. She remembered all the wonderful times she and the ant had had. Together they were strong, but when apart there was something missing. Loving was the key to their extraordinary friendship.

Summer came and went. The butterfly was getting old; still she never forgot about the ant. On a cold day in late August, the butterfly thought she saw a familiar sight. She flew closer. On her third swoop she realized that the familiar sight was her friend, the ant. They greeted each other with joy. The ant had fought his way back home, crossing rocks and streams and meeting all kinds of insects. Now the ant and the butterfly were flying together again.
