Walt Disney was born on 5 December 1901, in Chicago. His parents were of German/English and Irish descent. As a child, the Disney family moved between Marceline in Missouri, Kansas City and back to Chicago. The young Walt Disney developed an interest in art and took lessons at the Kansas City Institute and later Chicago Art Institute. He became the cartoonist for the school magazine.

When America joined the First World War, Walt dropped out of school and tried to enlist in the army where he was rejected for being underage, but he was later able to join the Red Cross which was working in Europe and in late 1918 was sent to France to drive an ambulance.

In 1919, he moved back to Kansas City where he got a series of jobs, before finding employment in his area of greatest interest – the film industry. When at the Kansas City Film Ad company he gained the opportunity to begin working in the relatively new field of animation. Walt used his talent as a cartoonist to start his first great accomplishment.

The success of his early cartoons enabled him to set up his own studio which was called Laugh-O-Gram. However, the popularity of his cartoons was not matched by his ability to run a profitable business. Labor costs which were very high forced the firm to go bankrupt. After his first failure, he decided to move to Hollywood, California which was home to the growing film industry in America.
