NOMADIC CLUBS

A new phenomenon has appeared in Britain in the last couple of years - nomadic clubs. These are clubs that appear in a different place each time. People go there to dance, drink or just enjoy themselves, but the clubs all have something in common – and that is style.

Probably the oldest of them is The Circus, which started about two years ago. The organizers are constantly searching for new, interesting locations and to date, the club has included an old warehouse, an army drill hall, a health club and a wine bar among its venues. As the owners say, „each event should be different from the last one”. Thus, The Circus completely transforms each new place with drapes, fluorescent paint, parts of old cars or anything which will create a new, different atmosphere. The DJ Jeremy, instead of just playing discs like everyone else, blends records together on the tape at home to create a completely original sound. The Circus never advertises. Its fame is spread by word of mouth –which also keeps it exclusive.

Among other itinerant clubs, The Dirtbox and The Substation also have hundreds of followers. The Dirtbox plays mainly funk, rockabilly, rhythm-and-blues. They aim to provide good music at a cheap rate. They first appeared above a sauna. The owners say, „The keynote is our unpredictability“.

The Substation, also cheap and only serving beer or coke straight from crates, has a totally different style. Their clientele tends to be dressed in outfits sold in military clothes shop and among other locations their meetings take place under railway arches. The owners are convinced that what happens in the club is more important than providing luxurious surroundings. They aim to provide a place with good atmosphere and no tension. The Substation is loved by youngsters, who prefer it to expensive, commercial, plastic discos.

The only problem these nomadic clubs have to face is the police raids. Occasionally the clubs get raided as they have no permission for playing music till early hours. However, as only the ”in-people“ know when or where they are next going to gather, the raids often fail.
