As soon as Mai An Tiem's wife heard about the punishment, she started to cry. "Don't worry. We can live on our own. Someday, we will be able to return to the mainland," Mai An Tiem said. The couple packed clothes and food for their journey.

A.

The next day, while Mai An Tiem and his wife were fishing along the shore, they saw a flock of birds eating a strange fruit. Mai An Tiem walked closer. He saw the birds had left behind black seeds and took them home to plant.

B.

The couple happily watched the seeds sprout. They took care of the plants every day. Their garden gave them hope for the future.

C.

Since then, watermelon has been the symbol of luck in Vietnam. People often choose it as one of five fruits to place on the ancestor altar on Tet holiday.

D.

The next morning, the King asked about what Mai An Tiem said at the banquet. Mai An Tiem said, "Your Majesty, the only things that really matter are those we can do on our own." King Hung was very angry. Although he loved his son, he decided to send Mai An Tiem to a deserted island.

E.

When they arrived on the mainland, the fisherman took the fruit to the village market. All the villagers loved the fruit. Word spread about the new tasty fruit from the island.

F.

A few months later, the fruit was ripe. Mai An Tiem cut a fruit and found it very juicy and sweet. He decided to name it 'watermelon' or 'dua hau' in Vietnamese. One day, he decided to carve his name into a fruit rind and throw it into the sea. He hoped someone would catch the fruit.

Once upon a time, King Hung adopted a son named Mai An Tiem. He was very smart, and the King really loved him. One day, during a royal banquet, the King ordered a servant to give Mai An Tiem delicious food. However, Mai An Tiem refused it and told the servant, "What is given is actually a debt."

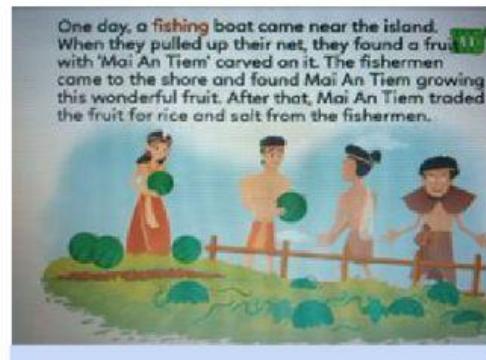

H.

When they reached the island, Mai An Tiem turned a cove into their house. He felt sorry for his wife, but he believed that they could find a way to live happily there.

One day, they saw a flock of birds come and eat the green unripe fruit from their garden. They did not chase them away. After the birds flew away, the couple picked up all the seeds that were left. Mai An Tiem believed the birds had eaten the best fruit.

K.

The next day, the King decided to bring the couple back to the mainland. Mai An Tiem picked all the ripe fruit to bring back with him. He also brought seeds to the mainland. He wanted to share the fruit with everyone, and teach them how to grow it.

L.

Year after year, Mai An Tiem carved his name on the fruit rind and threw it into the sea. His wife told him to stop, but he kept doing it. He didn't want to live on the island forever.

I.

King Hung also tasted the fruit and found it delicious. He wondered who had planted it. King Hung was shocked to hear that his son was still alive and grew the fruit. He was ashamed that he had sent Mai An Tiem to the island.
