I agree with this view for a few reasons.

Therefore, if students were allowed to participate in the lesson at their own pace without being timed, pushed, or barked at, the lesson could be more appealing and inviting (2nd conditional).

For the reasons shared above, I suggest that schools simply allow their high school students to exercise on their own time rather than at school.

As a result, discomfort is frequently caused (passive) to many high schoolers because the PE lessons are just so public.

Many high school students believe that physical education (PE) is an unnecessary, even harmful school subject.

For example, in our school, students are forced to start every PE lesson with a timed ten-minute run around the entire school while the teacher aggressively yells at everyone to keep up.

First of all, in our modern times, many young adults prefer to exercise alone for the sake of maintaining (gerund) their privacy.

Physical education classes have long been criticized (present perfect) by high school students largely for the format and the terms under which they take place.

For example, many youth are uncomfortable sweating in public or having others watch them move in revealing (gerund) sports clothing.

Secondly, PE lessons typically force students to do strenuous exercises in a uniform fashion that often feels too strict and challenging.
