(1) the fact that the classes Mark enjoyed most at school were the art classes, he chose to study physics at university so (2) to have a career in science. (3) only did he do well in his studies, he also found a job in a research laboratory which he found interesting and satisfying. It looked as if all his dreams had come true.

(4), Mark was not completely happy. He still dreamt of being an artist. And (5) matter how hard he tried, he couldn't get the idea out of his head. After work, he would go home and paint, and he spent most of his weekends painting too, but he never felt he had enough time to create something he was really proud of. On (6) of that, he was becoming exhausted because he worked in the lab for so many hours every day.

In the end, Mark spoke to his boss, and they agreed he could take six months off work, as (7) as he promised to return to work after that. Mark devoted himself to his painting for six wonderful months, producing a series of beautiful pictures. However, he began to miss his colleagues, (8) to mention the interesting work he did at the lab, so he didn't mind returning to work when the time came. Mark's paintings still hang on his walls at home, and he continues to combine his work and his art as best he can.
