Fighting for change

Bibi was seventeen years old and studying in Kathmandu, Nepal, when an earthquake hit her family home, forty miles away. Her first thought after hearing the news about the earthquake was to travel back to her home and see her family. 'When I came home to my village I saw how very sad everyone was,' she explained. 'When I arrived, the community had been living in big tents. Everyone was in one place, so there was a lot of noise. People were terrified of the bad weather and the ground was shaking after the earthquake, which made them even more frightened. However, they believed it was better to try to wait patiently for help.'

After a few days, she knew something had to happen. 'If we didn't move on, we would continue to live in fear. I encouraged my family to build a proper shelter. My brother and father got the wood. I realized that it wasn't just my house that was important - I wanted to help my community, too, so I started volunteering.' Two years later, Bibi, who has kindly and generously given up all her time, is still working to rebuild her village.

In the future, Bibi wants to help build safer homes for more families across her country. While other young people have decided to move abroad, Bibi feels it's important that she stays and helps her country. 'This is the time Nepal needs its young people the most.'
