In theory, the Athenian democracy was supposed to give laborers as much power as aristocrats, but in practice, the influence of the nobility remained strong. This is mostly because aristocrats had more resources available to them when it came to forging political alliances and maintaining their prestige.

As a result, many elected officials from the 5th century BCE belonged to the aristocracy. For example, even though the statesmen Perikles championed many reforms that limited the power of aristocracy, he himself belonged to the powerful family that claimed to be descended from the Homeric hero Nestor.

After the death of Perikles in 429 BCE, a new breed of leaders emerged who did not belong to old nobility. Instead, they were wealthy merchants who made their fortunes from trade or small factories rather than from land. Their opponents called these new leaders “demagogues”, meaning leaders of the common people.

- What was a paradox of Athenian democracy?
- Who was Pericles?
- What was a difference between the politicians of Perikles' time and after his death?
