WHY DO PEOPLE TRAVEL?

What are your reasons for wanting to travel? These are the four reasons why I believe people like myself are so interested in travel?

My current Hipster Trip around America was planned around three friends' weddings, many unofficial reunions and a return trip to my home of seven years: Boston. I've often said that people are what make a trip so interesting, so it shouldn't be surprising that one of the biggest reasons we travel is to visit friends and family. But a lot of us also probably travel to meet even more new and interesting people.

Whether it's skydiving or standing on the edge of a 116 story building in Toronto, visiting new cities often means new experiences. Maybe it's the foreign atmosphere, the fact that you may know very few people, or just an adrenaline rush from taking time off from life. Travel continually pushes me to my limits, often getting me outside of my comfort zone so I can try new things.

Over the summer I finally embarked on a trip to Italy—a country I always wanted to visit but never did (for silly reasons). Besides visiting Italy for the tourist sites, art and museums, I focused heavily on finding the best Italian food (especially pizza)!

Food and culture are often so intertwined it's often impossible to separate the two. And it's my guess that many of us (even non-foodies) travel to particular destinations for food, wine and other local specialties.

The three months I spent traveling around India during my big trip were some of the most intense and interesting months of my life. Every day was a new adventure (and often a challenge), but I learned so much during that time I wouldn't trade it for anything. I learned more about myself, about the world, about India and about humanity.
