Getting Along

One of the basic rules for sharing the same space is respect for other people's things. We cannot use what is not ours without the owner's approval. Read what Ethan says about it.

I have a five-year-old sister. Her name is Emily, and she always touches my things. I went to return a video game that was overdue from the library, and I couldn't find it anywhere.

Then, I found my sister playing it on my game console. She turned it off and ran to my mom.

I screamed at her. So my mom told me to calm down and in the future to put my things away in the closet.

Emily comes into my room while I'm at school. I bought a guitar a few weeks ago—it's my favorite possession. When I got back from school I saw her playing with it. She was hitting the strings really hard and screaming at the top of her voice. I shouted, "It's not yours!" So she ran off to my mom crying. Mom told me not to shout at Emily.

Once I hit her because she broke one of my toy models. She ran and called 911 and said I was abusing her. When the cops came, my mom explained it was a mistake, and she didn't let me say a word of the truth. When I was talking to my mom about it, she said that Emily was just trying to fix the toy.

If I ever have kids, the first thing I'm going to teach them is not to touch what isn't theirs.
