Smelly foods!

We all have our favourite foods, and we also have foods that we don't like at all! (9) Children, for example, often don't like eating vegetables. But that's probably because they would rather eat something tastier like pizza!

When it comes to what we eat, smell is very important. (10) However, did you know that there are very smelly foods that some people love to eat?

One of these is the durian, which is the smelliest fruit in the world. It has such a strong smell that it's not allowed on public transport in Singapore.

(11) Even taxis have signs to let passengers know they cannot travel with the fruit.

People find it difficult to describe the taste and the smell of durian. There is no food in the world that you can compare it to. Many who have smelled it describe it as 'old socks' or 'rubbish'. (12) It's very creamy and if you can forget about the smell, is quite pleasant to eat.

Cheese is another food that can be quite smelly. Napoleon Bonaparte's favourite cheese, Époisses, is famous for its strong smell. (13) Another French cheese, Vieux-Boulogne, was found to be the smelliest in the world. It was chosen by a group of human testers and an 'electronic nose' at a UK university. The machine analysed the different chemical smells from the cheese and rated it as the worst smelling.

Finally, let's talk about surströmming, a fish dish from northern Sweden that smells like rotten eggs, vinegar and bad butter. The fish is kept in barrels for a few months, then put into tins before being sold. (14) For this reason, some airlines do not allow passengers to carry the tins because they could explode. It's best to open the tin in water, wash the fish well and eat it outdoors. Otherwise, your house won't smell very pleasant.

If you want to experience some truly unusual flavours, try these unique foods!
