Today's English learners have a wide choice of dictionaries in which to choose from. There are dictionaries with American English, with British English, with idioms or slang, and even with pictures. One of the most popular dictionaries I have seen among many students are talking electronic dictionaries. All you have to do is type in a word in your language then you can see and hear it in English. That's great, right? Well, I think it's great, too... but only sometimes.

Bilingual electronic dictionaries are fast and easy. They can be great when you are travelling, and you need information quickly. But I am against electronic dictionaries and even bilingual paper dictionaries in many cases. When you reach an intermediate level of English, you know enough of the language to ask the meaning of certain things while using English. You should translate as little as possible and you should think in English as much as possible.

I also feel that paper dictionaries are better for studying than electronic dictionaries. True, they take longer to use. But, for some reason, the information you look up seems to stay in your head longer. It may be because you were forced to spell the word in your head and therefore "see it" more clearly in your mind. What will you do if you have checked an English-English dictionary and still don't understand anything? Go to your bilingual dictionary. It is useful sometimes; however, just remember to try to stay in English as much as possible.

Question 27: What does the passage mainly discuss?
