READING

VII. Read the following passage about Maggie and Claudia's opinions of countryside life in the UK, and choose the correct answer A, B, C or D.

Maggie

Maggie is from Shanghai and moved to live in a village near York. The village life here is wonderful. There is a great sense of community. Neighbours often greet each other in the street and the post office is the main place of contact. It's more relaxed and you can't tell who has money and who hasn't.

The residents of my village are hardly multi-cultural, and they seem easy going. Even if local people are curious about my background, so far no one has said anything. English people don't ask direct questions, they go around the moon to meet the sun. Children, however, are much more direct.

Claudia

Claudia is working in East Asia, moved to live in England. It's more difficult to live in the countryside due to the isolation. For internationals who are used to city life like me, living in an English country village presents challenges. There aren't so many facilities as in a city and transport links aren't so well-developed. It can also be harder to find communities that have similar ideas and interests.

The countryside of England in the summer is like a large well-kept garden that stretches on forever. For centuries landowners and local people have turned every part of England into something unusual in landscapes and local cultures.

The countryside of England today shows the wealth of landowners and success of people who tried to escape the luxury of city life. According to a recent survey, some 80% of Britain's population dream of living in the countryside, while only 20% actually live there.

English village communities are small and often eccentric. They are, however warm and usually welcoming. They also show the local charms of the 'English character'. The local post office or shop is the communications hub of every village. They also have old pubs and the village pub offers an opportunity for new comers to get to know local culture. But the heart of many rural communities remains a village church. Around these churches there are many community activities, from village funfair, council meetings to flower arranging.
