III. Reading comprehension

Globalization

Today, it is not at all abnormal for the goods you purchase to come from around the world. Sometimes, a single item is comprised of parts constructed in many different countries. This is applicable to almost anything you can buy today. Consider a sweater—the wool may be woven by a robot in China, dyed using artificial colors from India, and sold in the United States.

Long ago, the fiscal cost of importing or exporting items from foreign countries was high, and manufacturers considered the practice to be fiscally irresponsible. By contrast, prices were lower for goods that were made at home or in adjacent countries. Nowadays, however, the convenience of importing and exporting goods is largely thanks to globalization. Globalization means more closely-connected countries. Merchants broker deals between entrepreneurs from across the globe to consolidate their costs and configure the lowest prices for their products.

Imagine your company wants to start manufacturing bicycles and selling them. If a factory close to home did everything, it would be expensive — a bureaucracy would need to approve every decision, and its members would need to be paid. Some workers would be hired to mine the aluminum and others to find the rubber; then others would build the bikes and market them to local stores. However, dividing the tasks evenly between different countries in order to deduct or minimize certain costs makes a lot more sense. Paying for metal mined in Brazil and shaped in the Philippines can save manufacturing costs. Building the bikes in China, where prices are low, and selling them to Japan, where prices are high, can help a business owner make higher profits. The consensus among many traders is that globalization has helped them become wealthy.

Globalization, however, has its negative side as well, as local workers sometimes lose out to absent laborers in distant lands. For this reason, many commentators deem globalization as something negative. The ideological differences between supporters of globalization may clash with politicians who pass laws that try to limit it. Yet despite criticisms, globalization continues to grow stronger. United States' franchises like McDonald's, for example, can be found around the world, and almost all machines have parts that are made in China.

Part. A. Mark each statement T for true or F for false.

1. ___ In the past, goods from far away used to be more expensive than goods from close to home.
2. ___ Globalization means that countries are becoming more connected over time.
3. ___ One product today usually has parts made in many different countries.
4. ___ Globalization means more jobs for everyone.
5. ___ Globalization has many critics around the world even though it can make goods cheaper.

Part B. Answer the questions.

1. What is this reading about?

 - d. Fiscal responsibilities
 2. How can globalization save traders money?
 - a. By helping traders avoid bureaucracy and taxes.
 - b. By allowing traders to consolidate costs and find better prices globally.
 - c. By reducing the need for workers and factories.
 - d. By limiting the production of goods in local markets.
 3. Why do some people oppose globalization?
 - a. Because globalization makes goods more expensive.
 - b. Because globalization causes political conflicts between countries.
 - c. Because globalization reduces job opportunities for local workers.
 - d. Because globalization limits technological development.
