A LIFE CHANGING EXPERIENCE

Summer holidays are wonderful for some. For others it can be far too long with nothing to do, far away from friends, especially if your family aren't going anywhere interesting. This was the situation for George Benno. He had never been abroad before and he had never enjoyed the summer holidays. This summer he decided to do something different. He read an advert in the paper: the local children's hospital was looking for young people to come and work on the hospital radio, playing music and talking to the children who were in hospital.

'I don't know why I decided to go for it,' said George. 'I had never done anything like it before. But I just thought "Why not?" It's better than being bored at home for two months.'

George went to the hospital and got the job at the hospital radio station. He worked there from four o'clock until nine o'clock every day. He didn't get any money, but that didn't matter. He really enjoyed himself and found the work fun. 'It was a life-changing experience for me,' George says. 'Before this summer I had never been to hospital. I've always been really healthy and well. It was amazing to meet these kids who were really ill. Some of them had been in hospital for months and had had a very tough time, but they were still positive. I wanted to do my best for them. I spent hours planning my radio show, choosing music and organizing games and quizzes for them. The holidays went by really quickly!'

Was it challenging thinking of new music to play every day and sounding happy on the radio? 'Not really,' says George. 'I knew the children would enjoy the music I played and that was really motivating for me. It made me want to keep on going!'

Now George has gone back to school but he hasn't given up his hospital work. He has kept on working there on Saturdays and is planning to return there in his next school holidays.
