A

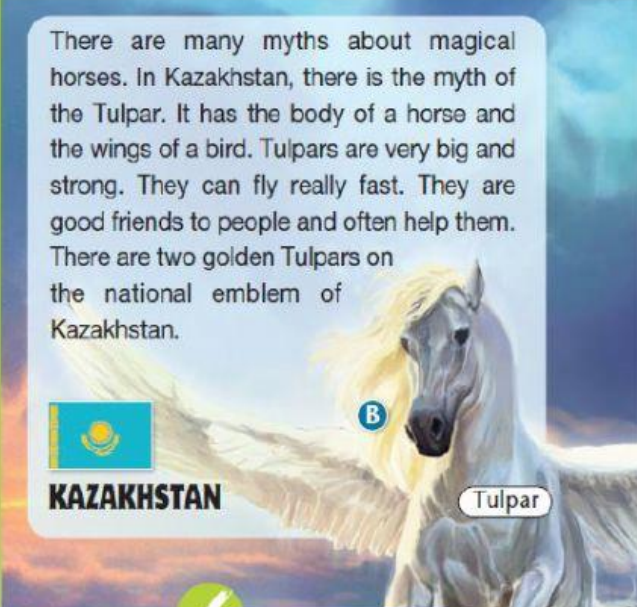

Australia's Bunyip is a creature from an Aboriginal myth. It lives near rivers and lakes and eats people. There are different descriptions of the Bunyip. Some people say it has a large body with scales and tusks like a walrus. Other people say it is like a big snake with a horse's mane. You can see the Bunyip on some Australian stamps.

There are many myths about magical horses. In Kazakhstan, there is the myth of the Tulpar. It has the body of a horse and the wings of a bird. Tulpars are very big and strong. They can fly really fast. They are good friends to people and often help them. There are two golden Tulpars on the national emblem of Kazakhstan.
