LIVEWORKSHEETS

Have you ever bought something that you didn't really need? It looked nice in the shop. There was an advert. You wanted it. All your friends had one. There are lots of excuses!

We throw away millions of mobile phones and computers every year. They aren't broken, we just want the latest model. But buying too much is bad for the environment because it creates pollution and uses up the world's resources. It is also expensive. It is better to buy less, and recycle or repair the things that we already have.

Could you survive a whole day without buying anything? Well, on the last Friday in November people around the world celebrate 'International Buy Nothing Day'. They buy absolutely nothing for 24 hours!

A Canadian artist called Ted Dave created the day in 1992. And the idea has spread around the world since then, and gets bigger every year. Nowadays, people in over 60 countries hold 'BND' protests including the UK, Austria, Germany, New Zealand and Japan.

You can celebrate Buy Nothing Day in different ways. You can organise fun activities such as silly protests in shopping centres with balloons, dancing, singing and music. Some protesters dress up in zombie costumes, or set up a market stall where they swap the things they don't want.

Not everyone likes Buy Nothing Day. Some TV channels refuse to advertise it and some people say that the protesters just buy more things the next day. Other people say that factories and shops give people jobs, or that BND is just a protest for people with too much money, because poor people only buy a few things. What do you think? Does Buy Nothing Day encourage us to produce less waste and think about what we buy?
